RESPECT

STUDENT & PARENT DISCOVERY

Respect: Treating people the way you want to be treated.

Overview: A respectful person treats people well. It's the best example of how they want to be treated. They are well-mannered, polite and considerate of others.

Respect offers the potential for making more friends and having better relationships. It also helps to create an environment of peace and harmony.

A person who respects him/herself aspires to be a better person through exercise and healthy eating, constant learning, and by doing the things they love.

Student: Respect is awesome because by treating people well, you get along better with others and you can make more friends. Always show respect for others by using good manners, being polite and considerate.

Show your parents respect by following their rules and doing what they ask you to do right away with a good attitude. Respect your brothers and sisters by sharing, being kind to them, and by getting along. Respect your teachers by paying attention, learning, and always doing your best. Respect the community you live in by keeping it clean.

Another kind of respect is self-respect. It's doing the things that help you to become a better person. You should respect your body exercising and eating healthy food. Respect your mind by learning something new every day. Respect your heart by spending time with your family, friends and by yourself.

Parent: A household based upon respect teaches children to value their parent's needs as well as their own. It teaches them healthy boundaries and to follow the rules you set as a parent.

Respect encourages your children to get along with their siblings. It teaches them to respect the values that make up your family. It gives them the ability to honor themselves and others.

Respect builds character. A child who has self-respect will be goal oriented and aspire to be the best person they can be. You can be the best example of respect for your children to follow. Treat them well as you would have them treat you well.
